Replying to "We need this in ever..."

My situation had great support with counseling intervention to protect the children. Unfortunately, the ability to enforce protective measures were limited in scope by the legal system (unless or until he broke a law in place) and by the church who struggled to say that ongoing CCV was a sinful pattern of behavior which could need church discipline. I like the idea of helping shape new laws and educating the public about CCV

Even with education, people who work with these individuals do not see it and it is easy for them to run their smear campaign. I was bragged to about how others believed him. "They know you did X to me." and X was something I didn't do and/or that he actually did to me. *It is common for abusers to allege their victim abused him the way he abused her. @Cindy Baltz-King Mandatory training for judges has been what I've thought for years! what do you envision by training all the attorneys too? They are still required to "zealously advocate" for their client -- even a creep. In an ideal world, attorneys would be heavily trained in CC and Domestic Abuse in law school. Attorneys are appointed to judgeships or run to become a judge. The earlier the training, the better.

I love what Tabitha said, "Don't get caught in the what if. Stay in the what is and trust God!" This has been a helpful way of thinking in my own situation and to those whom I have counseled. 3. Any crime related to your partner could be domestic violence

It is a common misconception that domestic violence is limited to only physical, verbal and emotional assault against your spouse by you. But any crime against your partner with an intention of coercion, control, punishment, intimidation, or revenge could come under Domestic violence category. So if the husband breaks down the smartphone of his wife intentionally to insult her then it will be a crime according to Colorado State law.

QUESTION -- How is "attempt to escape" defined? And under this definition, if someone escapes on first or second attempt does it mean NOT coercive control? (Also QUESTION above I forgot to label) It is Coercive Control after each attempt to escape. Because we know on average, a woman leaves 7 times before she leaves for good, we still recognize each escape attempt as coercive control that requires safety planning (discussed in next courses.)

Question: If you know about someone being held captive who cannot communicate because he checks her phone. She's not allowed to have any social contacts whatsoever. He has physically hit her in the head, broken her finger, and threatened her. He has stolen her money. He leaves for periods of time during which she reaches out but is mentally a captive and doesn't leave. Is there anything that can be done by an advocate, friend or family member to alert someone of the danger she is in, without putting her in further danger? Your advocacy group will help you figure this out because it's on a case-by-case basis. We know the best option is to arrange a plan with her to leave while he's gone and avoid telling him that is her plan. This is a very delicate process to keep her and any children safe from escalation.
