But IF an abuser is diagnosed, professionally, with a personality disorder...is it not ok for this to be used to help the victim and others involved, to understand, adjust expectations (maybe even hope for change), face reality, etc...what? What can we do with this diagnosis. My husband was diagnosed professionally. It was SO SO SO helpful to me. 20 years of confusion with him became crystal clear. It was spot on.

I can see where you don't use the diagnosis as an excuse, but does it not describe/explain what their patterns of behavior are and most likely will be unless there is a drastic change...repentance.

It depends on who did the assessment. Diagnoses can change - and a practitioner can do a more thorough history and exam and render a different diagnosis. CPTSD is not a DSM diagnosis (yet), but PTSD is.
