Mental illness does not cause coercive control. There are some mental illnesses that can trigger abusive or violent behavior (at times schizophrenia), or some neurological issues (like dementia). This is still not pattern driven. There is a need for boundaries for any victims.

I would not categorize things such as sociopathy as a “mental illness”.

For other mental illnesses, there are many who struggle, and they do not abuse others.

One note here- we can look at whether this is happening across the board/in other settings. Where is this happening? Is this person behaving this way at work/treating their boss and coworkers this way? Often times, abusers keeps a public persona that is very different from who they are behind closed doors/at home and how they choose to behave at home. This suggests this is a deliberate choice.

I went before a judge here in Georgia to try and get a TPO against my ex-husband (abuser). He and I have been divorced for over 10 years, but his abuse has never stopped, it just seems to wax and wane in severity. Over the Summer, after over a year of him not contacting our children at all or attempting visitation (we share 4 children together), he began showing up at my house and standing in the driveway "waiting for visitation." There was even a situation where my neighbor confronted him at one point. Anyway, the judge told me, point blank, "let me define domestic violence for you- domestic violence is when someone is being hit, slapped, kicked, punched, choked or strangled; unless any of that is happening, you don't have a basis for a protective order because it's not necessary." Our second-born daughter was with me that day, she is 21 years old, and I will never forget the way it made both of us feel. The judge talked to me like I was a total fool for even seeking protection.

Submission, by definition, is totally voluntary. If it is demanded, or if there are repercussions, that's subjugation

13:12:13 From Jolene Underwood to Everyone:

When your abuser calls you the abuser they're basically telling on themselves but substituting your name for theirs. Horribly painful to hear it. Hopefully, it's helpful to reframe what's happening. They aren't going to take responsibility so you will get named as the one responsible instead of them.
